LAND SALE

Constitutionality of Act Is Being Argued Before Judges at Knoxville.

KNOXVILLE, Tenn., Oct. 16. (Sp.)—The constitutionality of the Tennessee land registration act is being tested in the supreme court of Tennessee here. Arguments in the case of the state, against W. K. McClure, vs. James H. Copeland, registrar, were heard before that tribunal Wednesday afternoon.

This case involves the rights of landowners who desire to go into chancery court and have a Tennessee title deed for their property. Such title, it is claimed, is very valuable and can be easily traced down when seeking to sell or to secure loans on it. All transactions concerning any particular tract of land must be recorded or registered on the same page in the registrar's office, it is explained.

A deed was presented to Mr. Copeland for registration under this act, and he declined to register it, claiming that the Tennessee act was unconstitutional. A mandamus suit was brought against him in chancery court, seeking to force him to enter the deed under the new system. He appealed to the supreme court, with the result that the case is now pending before that tribunal.

County Attorney J. G. Johnson attacked the constitutionality of the act on the grounds that land could be taken under that act without what he termed as due process of law. He said that when any, or all, of the claimants of any title are not known by a person who seeks to obtain a Tennessee title to any piece of land that publication may be made "to whom it may concern." He claimed that this is not a sufficiently definite publication. Johnson also alleged that a person who might secure title through the practice of fraud might hold the title unless action should be brought against him within one year. In addition to these allegations, he claimed that the act calls upon the registrar to perform judicial acts.
